KING CARL BENJAMIN.

If you will look at a map of the Pacific you will find lying mid-way between the tropic of Cancer and the equator, six hundred miles west of [the Marshall group, thirteen dots. On some maps they are marked "Thirteen islands, well inhabited." That is all there is to point out their significance. It is on the biggest of these, called by the sailor Benjamin Island, after himself, that he has taken up his home. It is about ten by twenty miles in extent. Well inhabited means that there is quite a sprinkling of dark-skinned natives there, as well as many more who move to and fro in the archipelago with

It's a wonder they don't die of liberality. "Benjamin is doing some good work there, however. He carried three or four books with him on his raft, the last thing you would have expected, and he has contrived The National Forge and Iron Company, organized at Chicago some time since for the to teach the natives English. Benjamin is purpose of erecting a rolling-mill, have so an American of German or Jewish descent, cured a very good location for their works and is a lover of books. The first thing he at Burnside, which is at Ninety-third street, did was to select an intelligent native and on the Illinois central railroad and the Belt teach him the alphabet. The fellow learned road, with other raliroad lines in the immerapidly, and soon began to teach it to others diste vicinity. Contracts for the erection and a number of them can now speak of the buildings and the construction of the English, while the rising generation im-

"Benjamin has picked out the handsomest women for wives, and they esteem it quite an honor. The King lives in the biggest bamboo house in the village of Ki, a straggling aggregation of native houses on a coral reef. His children are of all ages, and are a sprightly, lively lot. Nobody bothers much with clothes in the South Paclic, still Benjamin wears a little something, and is gradually prevailing on the natives to do so, to be the south prevailing on the natives to do so, to be the south packets and second streets.

An Old Woman Who Lives in a Shed and Bathes in Brine.

Many odd characters are developed and fostered in the rural districts, but, says the New York Herald, few are more striking than Julia Ann Houghtaling, who lives in a coal shad at Stanfordville, Dutchess, alone and without the bare necessities of life though past ninety years of age, sternly resenting all proffered assistance and taking a bath in brine, which she believes to be the elixir of eternal life. She is the descendant of a family whose personal oddities have become legendary. The first to gain a place in local chronicles was Moses Talmadge, who conceived the strange notion that there was no good reason for death. As a preventive of dissolution he instituted a sys-tem of brine bathing, which his descendants have religiously preserved. He married twice and one son became a justice of the peace, in which capacity he distinguished himself by continually quoting Solomon and announcing himself as inspired from Heaven to administer justice to mankind. The simple country people had an abiding belief in the fanatic, but their superstition received a shock when both Moses Talmadre and his son passed into the world beyond notwithstanding the boasted potency of brine bath. Julia Ann Houghtaling, the subject of this sketch, is the greatgrandaughter of Moses Talmadge and the only survivor of her ec-centric family. She inherits all the po-culiar notions of her ancestors, and ap-pears to have evolutionized into more advanced forms of belief, having adopted the theory that the land belongs to every body, and therefore the payment of rent is an ob-solete custom to be frowned out of fashion. There is hardly a rentable house in Stan-fordville that she has not been evicted from. A year ago she was evicted from a house owned or controlled by a man named Rogers. Her worldly goods were placed by the roadside, where they have since been exposed to rain and blizzard, and have crumbled and settled into a shapeless mass. Peneliess and homeless she made her way ters uninvited, and where I found her yes-terday, sitting by a small stove and reading an old newspaper. She is tall and very thin, with silvery white hair and deep set blue eyes sparkling with vitality.
